Terbutaline was extracted from plasma with ethyl acetate and dried over anhydrous sodium sulfate, derivatized with pentafluoropropionic anhydride, and extracted from the methylene chloride phase into ethyl acetate. Recovery of terbutaline added to human plasma was greater than 95%. The detection limit for this method was 5 ng/ml. At this sensitivity, amounts of terbutaline detectable in the plasma of a normal subject ranged from 20 to 37 ng/ml.Q: Can't have both ':' and '&' in a string with String.Format The String.Format() method's documentation says: p0 can contain format items that consist of the format key & value and p1 can contain format items that consist of the format key : value. The total number of format items in p0 and p1 must equal the number of format items in the format string. That seems to say that there are no restrictions on using both a ':' and a '&' in the same format item. Yet, MSDN documentation for String.Format() actually says: If a format item has a substring between the "%" and the corresponding "%" delimiter, the item specifies a format subgroup. The format subgroup consists of the preceding format item and the succeeding format item. For example, "% ba244e880a
