The fate of rhesus monkey foetuses with early transplacental exposure to aflatoxin. The rate of foetal loss was investigated in a number of rhesus monkey (Macaca mulatta) pregnancies during gestation. These foetuses were exposed in utero by maternal oral administration of a very low level of aflatoxin B1. Placenta, liver, pituitary, thyroid and adrenal were examined for histological changes. The most significant effect was on the thyroid. In animals where treatment with aflatoxin occurred during the first two to three months of gestation, the incidence of thyroid involution and hyperplasia was significantly higher (p less than 0.01 and 0.05, respectively). This may be linked to a reduction in the size of the thyroid gland which was observed at 105 days gestation. It is suggested that this could result in reduction of the thyroid hormone reserves of the foetuses and induce the changes observed. The significance of this is discussed. A new study shows that the ongoing trade war between the U.S. and China is having a dramatic effect on the price of solar panels, and it may be the nail in the coffin for an industry that had been hoping to see a price decrease. The U.S. is more than doubling the solar panels it imports from China in recent years, and the trade war has not been kind to Chinese manufacturers who are heavily reliant on U.S. demand. The price of solar panels in the U.S. has been dropping since the trade conflict started, but Chinese solar panel prices are now soaring. The price of Chinese solar panels soared 29% from May to August this year, according to Bloomberg. Analysts believe that the price increases are rooted in the trade war, which has increased the American demand for solar panels. There's also something else at play: the lowest cost area for manufacturing solar panels is now in eastern China. There have been several reports from major solar panel manufacturers in China about the low costs of solar panel manufacturing in eastern China, which has led to a drop in the price of solar panels. American solar companies are now seeing the writing on the wall and are preparing for an eventual switch to Chinese manufacturers. "Investors now believe the trade war will be a long one, and that has driven down ba244e880a
