Telomeres and carcinogenesis. A progressive shortening of telomeres has been directly linked to cancer risk in numerous tissues. We briefly review the evidence that telomere function is relevant to cancer development in these tissues and present preliminary data demonstrating in vivo telomere shortening in human HNC. Progression from HNC can be influenced by a variety of endogenous factors. Cigarette smoke, environmental toxins such as arsenics, DNA damaging agents, such as ionizing radiation and ultraviolet light as well as a genetic defect in expression of a DNA repair protein (XRCC5) can contribute to telomere shortening and ultimately lead to genomic instability, centrosome amplification and loss of gene expression, the hallmarks of oncogenesis. These observations support the hypothesis that telomere shortening contributes to the carcinogenic process in the HNC cell.Q: Remove last record from a table I have a table that has 6 records in total, here is an example: --Example with 6 records ColumnA | ColumnB ----- A |
