When an entire object is described in the shape of polygons, since only that part which is to be displayed can be in the form of polygons, control of rendering of background information is left to be described by color information. A system referred to as a non-interlace system can be implemented with regard to the color information about the background. In this non-interlace system, the number of bits is smaller than a full color RGB system. Meanwhile, in the case of inputting a signal which is encoded in the shape of polygons into a conventional computer, since a size of a displayed image is a screen size, the number of pixels for a single polygon is limited to a certain number of numbers. For example, in case of a screen size of 640×480 pixels, a size of a polygon is limited to a value within the range of 32×32 to 512×512. Therefore, a fast search process for a color similar to the background color will not be available. For example, in case of matching colors to be detected in the above-mentioned 655 color space with colors, which are set by an image editing program, for example, the matching process of 655 colors can take significantly long time. This problem is seen when a display of image data recorded on an optical disk is provided to the user on the fly. In particular, it may be seen that the speed of the color-value matching process becomes significantly long in case where an object to be searched is similar to the background color.
