In a liquid crystal display device of the type in which a liquid crystal is sandwiched between two transparent substrates, a liquid crystal display panel is formed by adhering two of such substrates to each other. In the conventional practice, this is usually done by applying an adhesive onto the substrate and pressing the other substrate against the adhesive. This method has a drawback that the surface of the pressed substrate is rugged. Since the condition of pressing can influence the quality of the liquid crystal display panel, it is important to control the pressing operation carefully. In order to overcome such a disadvantage, there has been proposed a method in which no adhesive is
