Q: regular expression to parse csv file I have a csv file in which a row consists of two parts: the first column has fixed length, say 5 characters, the second column can be of any length. Each of the last one to three columns has a name. I want to read all the rows into a structure that contains an integer (row_number) and an array of the second column (one row per index). If any of the last two columns don't have a name, then they will also be stored as an array of null pointers. I could read the file line by line, but as I only need two of the last three columns, the strings are actually quite short. I found the function `readline()` in the File class of the IO library, which I think can help me. But I don't know how to use the regular expression style used by the function. A: You can read the whole file to a string with `read(StringBuffer)`, and then use `StringTokenizer` to split it on the different tokens (columns, row numbers etc.).
