Boost Product Key applications were distributed for free to older machines, only to be sold for a price when Windows 95 rolled out. The distribution company tried to give it away for free, but that didn't really work out. The next machine was Microsoft's Windows NT, which was supposed to be a clone of the Windows 95. Nevertheless, the Windows NT was another failure, and the next version in line was Windows 98. Now, a couple of years later, Microsoft decided to exit the home desk market. The percentage-based pricing, while it may have had benefits, did not work as it should, and Microsoft only made back the money it spent creating and distributing the software. For this reason, we need to ask ourselves, what do we lose if we buy the Boost Serial Key applications? What we gain? SysLog Sender allows user to simulate any syslog message sending via a simulated syslog server. A simulated syslog server is basically a service running in the background that receives and saves syslog messages for later use. It is generally used for testing or simulating syslog server which is usually used by network-based software applications. Example of SysLog Sender simulated syslog server: Log messages are received by SysLog Sender and saved into a file. This is done by manipulating the contents of the file to simulate a syslog server. It is possible to control how often a syslog message is received, the exact time that the message will be delivered, etc. SysLog Sender is a freeware program designed to simulate a syslog server which is generally used for testing or simulating network-based software applications (such as Microsoft Web Server, DNS Server, Remote Access Server, SNMP Monitor, etc.) that use syslog to transmit log messages to a remote syslog server. It can also be used for solving problems with network connection and remote programs which send syslog messages. This tool can save the processing time by the syslog server and it is good to ease the debugging process. SysLog Sender is based on Windows NT/2000/XP and Windows Server 2003 platform. It supports sending the log messages to systems in a local network or another over the Internet by using TCP/IP protocol. The user must manually generate the SysLog messages. SysLog Sender is free and available for download and use. Evaluation and conclusion: SysLog Sender is not a stand-alone application. There is a simulating syslog server as well as a simulator program, but these two parts are not integrated into one application. SysLog Sender is designed to be used with the simulating syslog server, hence, it is necessary to purchase one separately. SysLog Sender is suitable for testing the syslog message sending since the simulator is able to modify the contents of the log file. Log Message formats supported by SysLog Sender is as follows: ☐ Standard Syslog format ☐ POE Syslog format ☐ Common Log Format ☐ Microsoft Syslog format ☐ Portable Syslog Format SysLog Sender can be used to mimic any syslog server, thus, it is able to simulate any syslog message sending via a simulated syslog server.
