I have this piece of code: private function textToImage($text) { return file_get_contents(base_path(). Thanks. A: You could use the following. $test = 'Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet, consectetur adipiscing elit. Nam id lectus ac libero ultrices luctus. Sed eget ultricies enim, ac hendrerit enim. Maybe you've seen the pictures of the "kidnapped" child... maybe you haven't. The story is being reported as real by some outlets, but it's largely being ignored by other sources. The situation is here, though: That photo is real. And it's incredibly sad. The child was, apparently, taken from a parking lot of a drive-through liquor store. The child and her mother were there to buy cigarettes, but the mom stepped out to talk to a different customer while the child's dad pulled up and attempted to take her away. Instead, he was intercepted by a sheriff, who convinced him to leave the child at the door of the liquor store. The dad is now in jail. The two adults are now both in jail for interfering with a police investigation. Here's the dad: And here's the woman who was there to buy cigarettes with her child. And here's the police who arrested her. That, apparently, is the story, because the story has been reported as being a true one... by local news. But elsewhere, the story is being reported as something else entirely. See, here's the Eugene Police Department's Facebook page and here's its report. And here's a local ABC news report (which has been reported elsewhere). And here's another local report, which was reported elsewhere. There are a number of problems here. First, these are all real news stories. They're all true. And this is not one of them. Second, these are all written by local news. Local news in Eugene has a different set of incentives from local news in New York, and so they're likely to report this story as though it was a true one. But if it's a true story, why aren't they reporting the equally true story of what happened instead? It's not like Eugene news can't get access to the story of the arrest. What would be the difference if they weren't able to read it, when they were all able to see that it's not true? Third, the police don't actually have a statement to make about the case, and if the reports are accurate, the parents are
