Herkimer's Downtown Outdoor Antiques store in the Old Town area of downtown Herkimer is staying open past the summer, as owner Beth Kolisnyk said she and her staff have been able to find work in other businesses throughout town. The store, located at 176 Market St. in the heart of downtown, opened five years ago, with some of the antiques and collectibles that fill its inventory coming from the storied past of the town. Kolisnyk said in the past two years, as the local economy has begun to change, more and more customers from the region have come into the store, causing an increase in foot traffic that the owners did not anticipate. "Now that I'm living here, it's amazing how many people here that I know from out of town, either work at the town, or have a family member or friend that lives here, so they're actually calling here to shop," said Kolisnyk. The owners and staff of the store are hoping to convert their outdoor seasonal antiques store into an indoor winter antiques and general store, but as of now, Kolisnyk said they aren't sure that their customers would welcome the move to an all-season store. Despite the uncertain future for the Herkimer business Kolisnyk said she continues to believe in the town and its people, as well as its economy. She credits the growth of the economy and, in turn, the town's population, in part to the presence of the U.S. military base at Fort Drum. "I think it has made a huge difference here, because there are a lot of people that work here, a lot of people that live here, and a lot of people that visit here from outside that I don't think could do that without the base," said Kolisnyk. "It has brought a lot to the area, and we're still very, very positive about it."19f6c50d8bf8fc2bd3ef3b8f6c2e7735aceeef732275244', ':endpoint', ', '--format', 'json',

Facial expression processing in HIV-positive patients. HIV-positive individuals are at risk of developing neuropsychological disorders. The facial expression recognition task is a well-validated task that has not yet been used to assess cognitive impairment in HIV-positive patients. The aims of this study were to characterize cognitive impairment of HIV-positive individuals as determined by the facial expression recognition task, to identify factors associated with impairment, and to assess the effect of antiretroviral therapy (ART) on facial expression processing. A total of 35 HIV-positive patients with a median CD4 cell count of 617 (interquartile range [IQR] = 209-1042) cells/ $\mu$ L and 35 HIV-negative control participants completed the facial expression recognition task. Separate analyses were performed for the Emotion and Fear trials. The Emotion trial did not reveal any differences between HIV-positive patients and controls. The HIV-positive patients processed the Fear trials significantly slower than the controls, with a median time of 13.8 s (IQR = 3.0-23.1 s) compared with a median time of 7.0 s (IQR = 3.4-16.4 s) in the control group. Simultaneous regression analyses in patients without evidence of cognitive impairment ( $n = 22$ ) revealed that the processing of the Fear trials was significantly associated with viral load and with age. Because the control group was matched for demographic characteristics, diagnostic history, and smoking status, it is likely that the reduced performance in the HIV-positive patients can be attributed to HIV-induced pathology. This study indicates that facial expression processing may be compromised in the context of HIV-infection. ART seems to have a beneficial effect on facial expression processing, but further longitudinal research is needed.

Q: How do I create a subspace of a vector space? I know there is a formula  $\mathbb{R}^n = V \oplus W$  if  $V$  and  $W$  are two subspaces of  $\mathbb{R}^n$ . But I do not get how this can be interpreted in Mathematica. A: To see how this works, first make a list of coordinates  $v = \{x, y, z\}$ ;  $v = \{x, y, z\}$ ;  $\{x, y, z\}$  and then check that they are vectors (of course, in Mathematica they have this property by default
