propaganda about non-violence in the mainstream media False propaganda about non-violence in the mainstream media By Mark Freeman | Print | Share Article Communication False propaganda about non-violence in the mainstream media False propaganda about non-violence in the mainstream media The New York Times, in a front-page article on January 13, 1998, published the following false propaganda: "The only people who like to kill are people of reason." The article points to the fact that it is people who "kill people of other beliefs," and are therefore "outcasts." One may assume that the author is either ignorant of the fact that people kill for a variety of reasons, or that he has simply chosen to ignore it. The same applies to the article's statement that only people of reason who act to prevent violence against others are moral: obviously, many people behave immorally, and it is a falsehood to imply that there are only moral people among them. The author cites a few examples of people who supposedly have acted irrationally or out of anger, but he fails to mention the fact that killing is rational for those who believe that they have a right to kill, and that there is such a thing as reason for them. The author maintains that there are only two kinds of humans in the world: those who kill and those who don't. He does not acknowledge the existence of those who would not kill if they believed in free will, and would not attempt to control others by violence. He also does not acknowledge the existence of those who would not kill if they thought that they could be killed. The author of the article does not acknowledge that reason is only one of the factors that influence people's behavior, such as self-preservation, gender, upbringing, culture, upbringing, background, and so on. This lack of awareness results in the article's statement that "only people of reason who act to prevent violence against others are moral." This statement is false, since the author fails to understand the difference between reason and morality, and between human reason and the reasons or motivations of individual humans. The article explains how people "kill people of other beliefs" because they are outcasts. But the author fails to mention that people kill for a variety of reasons. He fails to mention that people kill out of anger because they are outcasts, or that they kill out of self-preservation because they are outcasts. In fact, the author fails to mention the existence of any person who is not an outcast, and therefore cannot be a target of violence. People may kill because they believe that their lives or the lives of those close to them are in danger, such as if they believe that there is an imminent threat of harm to their lives or the lives of those close to them. People may kill if they believe that their lives or the lives of those close to them are about Patients on long-term antithrombotic therapy require safe discharge from hospital. Thrombotic and haemorrhagic complications may occur during and after discharge. To examine whether treatment strategy could be a determinant of discharge on antithrombotic therapy, the records of 140 consecutive patients discharged on antithrombotic treatment were retrospectively reviewed. Post-discharge thromboembolic events occurred in 9 patients (6%) and intracranial haemorrhages in 3 (2%). Post-discharge thromboembolic events occurred as a result of 'sporadic' risk factors: vascular surgery (n=2), acute myocardial infarction (n=2) and motor accident (n=1). Post-discharge haemorrhages occurred in 2 patients (1.4%) following acute myocardial infarction. Both patients had been discharged following multidisciplinary assessment, including re-challenge with aspirin. In 4 patients, a pro-thrombotic state, including oral contraceptive use, pregnancy, surgery, acute myocardial infarction, renal failure and oral anticoagulant overuse, were identified as 'sporadic' risk factors for thromboembolism. In a proportion of cases, these patients could have been discharged safely without anticoagulation. However, in the majority of cases, the optimal duration of anticoagulation after a major haemorrhage or thromboembolic event was not known.
